Prof. Dewar lectured recently at the Royal Institute on the "Solid and Liquid States of Matter." Ice, he said, was ordinarily regarded as a viscous substance, inasmuch as we could squeeze it. When we applied considerable pressure to it, we could force it into the form of a wire, says the London Standard. But lice was none the leas a brittle substance, and if we cooled it, as the lecturer did by pouring liquid air upon it, it would crack all over—which the ice obligingly did. From the ice the lecturer passed to an investigation which had been travelled over in a previous lecture. He spent some time in explaining his vacuum vessels. Sometimes these vessels are made in the shape of flagons, sometimes in the form of test tubes. For one experiment they are made in the shape of the goblets which we usually associate with the historic drama.

In the form of test tubes use is made of a doub's set of them, one inside the other, to make liquid and solid air. In the outer tube liquid oxygen is placed. Pressure is taken off the liquid oxygen by air pumps until it cools to such an extent that it liquefies the air in the inner tube, which is surrounded by the liquid oxygen. Pressure is then taken off this liquid air by another set of air pumps until it grows so cold that, as was shown with the greatest success yesterday afternoon, the liquid suddenly solidifies, and the wondering spectator sees the air which he is breathing frozen to a solid mass before his eyes.

Prof. Dewar showed that red oxide of mercury when subjected to the intense cold of liquid oxygen. Its tis color and became yellow; that amyl alcohol solidifies to a glassy mass, and methyl alcohol to a mass of white crystals: that a hydrocarbon like turpentime freezes to a clear glass. Histiphide of carbon when colored purple with bidine becomes a zijahtty red crystalline solid. The pretiest experiment of the afternoon was the last. Prof. Dewar showed that when his image was projected upon the screen the spectators could see a tiny snowstorm going on in the glass.
